RoxyLabs Up 83% in IPO

Local company surges; typography credited

NEW YORK — RoxyLabs, the local chew-toy manufacturer, had a spectacular first day on the NASDAQ. Shares of RoxyLabs, priced at $20 each, rose to a high of $40.25 before closing at $36.60. RoxyLabs ended the day with a market capitalization of close to $517 billion, making it very prestigious.

CEO Vanessa Manganese took the news in stride. "Our performance today shows that investors believe in our strategy of taking a scientifically insignificant product and surrounding it with a lot of hype and unverifiable claims," she said. "And of course, impressive typography." → NEXT PAGE

Angeleno Society Demolishes "Helicopters"

The Angeleno Society went down in flames this past Friday with the debut of Michael Broderick's new play Black Helicopters.

How bad is it? By the end of the first act, merely bad would've been a welcome kindness. By the end of the second act, the audience, myself included, was reconsidering the value of free speech in our society.

Broderick (directing, to use an optimistic term, from his own script) stars as Potiphar Tewkesbury, a character who is himself a playwright and director. Autobiographical? You might think so, except that the play is set—inexplicably, unbearably—in the year 2605. This serves largely as a pretext for the cast to wear no → CONT'D ON PAGE 9

CLARITY, PERSONALITY, SIMPLICITY, WARMTH.

Author William Zinsser, in his 1976 book On Writing Well, identified these as the four indispensable qualities of great writing. Why indispensable? Because the best writing is an expression of the writer's humanity. These qualities allow that humanity to shine through. As a writer, I find Zinsser's argument persuasive. ✨ And as a typographer, I find that his argument analogizes well to design. The designer's role is to take mundane items and fill them with warmth and humanity. For instance, a font. What is it, really? Just a set of tiny black shapes. Yet, as every reader knows, those little shapes can express a huge range of emotions and possibilities. ✨ This contrast between constraints and possibilities is what anchors my enduring fascination with typography. Type possesses a strange magic. One reason I embark on new type-design projects is to understand that magic better. ✨ Another reason is to have some better fonts. CONCOURSE is my first new sans serif design in nearly 20 years. Hopefully, I've learned a few things. ✨ Perhaps most important among them is that drawing letters is the lowest form of type design. The magic inhabits the spaces in between—on the page, but also between us as readers & writers. Type builds a bridge that spans time and space, that connects us through the written word, that lets us share warmth and humanity. There's nothing else like it. MB

W. A. DWIGGINS

THE GEOMETRIC SANS SERIF TYPEFACE has been a staple of the typographer's toolkit for nearly a hundred years. The first in the category was Erbar, the 1922 face that inspired dozens of others, including the still ubiquitous Gill Sans and Futura. In the late 1920s, Erbar also inspired American designer W. A. Dwiggins to create Metro.

Born in 1880, Dwiggins started out as a book designer and illustrator. He's credited with coining the term "graphic designer" in 1922. He would go on to become an influential type designer too.

Metro, his first typeface, unabashedly rode on the coattails of the trendsetting geometric sans serifs from Europe. But Dwiggins considered those faces to be overly rigid. His goal for Metro was to blend the geometric style with more warmth and personality.

My affection for Metro, however, began long before I'd learned the name Dwiggins. As a teenager, I discovered Spy magazine. Spy—as designed by Stephen Doyle and Alexander Isley—opened my eyes to typography. The two fonts Spy used the most were Garamond #3 and Metro. I totally had a crush on them. Still do.

It was the '80s, however, so Spy was using the earliest digital version of Metro, which had many shortcomings. I always hoped that some Dwiggins fan—and among American type designers, there are many—would create a reconsidered version of Metro.

No one did. So two years ago, I began Concourse, with the idea of reviving the original Metro.

What I like about Metro, and the other geometric sans serifs of its era, is their unusual adaptability. They can come across as historical or contemporary, depending on how they're used. Like the best dinner-party guests, they add personality to the conversation without dominating it. This is why they remain valuable tools for typographers.

But when I started studying original samples of Metro, a funny thing happened. Though there was much I liked about Metro (e.g., its distinctive figures), there was also much I disliked (e.g., its ungainly lowercase). The disappointing truth emerged—as it often does with teenage enthusiasms—that the reality of Metro didn't measure up to my idealized memories.

Sorry, Metro. It's not you. It's me.

But parting ways with Metro sharpened the design brief for Concourse: it would be a sans family that drew on my affection for Metro and its era, but that didn't skimp on versatility, warmth, or personality. For instance—

↑ Six weights. In many of today's sans families, intermediate weights are made by mathematical interpolation. This buys consistency, but to my eye, comes at the cost of too much personality. So I drew each weight of Concourse individually, to elicit more personality—elegance at the lighter end, cheerfulness at the heavier end.

↑ Small caps. Sans serifs look great in all-cap settings. So why are small caps such a rare feature in sans serif families? Concourse has small caps for all six weights, stored in separate fonts—the C series. The C series fonts have the same uppercase characters as the T series (used for standard text), but their spacing has been optimized for all-caps settings.

↓ Real italics. Traditionally, sans serif italics are based on sloped versions of the regular styles. This approach makes them less useful for emphasis. It's also a little dull. I took a more vigorous approach with Concourse's italics, adding flared ends and sharpened bowls that add contrast and visual interest.

↑ Duplexing. In type, duplexing means matching the widths between styles so that each character occupies the same space on the page. This way, you can easily change the weight and style without affecting your layout. In Concourse, weights 2, 3, 4, and 6 are duplexed to each other. (For this reason, the three lighter weights all use weight 6 as their bold style by default.) Every italic is also duplexed to its roman, including weights 7 and 8.

↓ Stylistic sets. I checked—there’s no rule that says a font always has to look the same. So Concourse has groups of alternate glyphs that are invoked via OpenType stylistic sets. Use them as ready-made options for text and display, or as a construction kit to assemble your own creative variations. (More samples on the next page.)

↑ Figures & fractions. Concourse has lining figures by default, but also oldstyle, proportional, tabular, superscript, and subscript figures, plus a full set of single-digit fractions.

Widely compatible. Concourse can be used with nearly all modern document-layout programs, from InDesign to Pages to Microsoft Office, Windows or Mac.

No-hassle embedding. The standard license allows Concourse to be embedded in PDFs, e-books, apps, and websites—no extra charge.

A companion for Equity. If you have my text face Equity, you’ll find that it pairs well with Concourse. (And if you don’t have Equity, you can get it together with Concourse at a friendly rate. See page 20.)

STYLISTIC SETS

Standard Mode

Not long ago, I discovered that it only takes a small number of alternate glyphs to give a headline or block of text a noticeably different texture.

That finding led me to add six Open-Type stylistic sets to Concourse (three of which appear here, and the others—Eastern Mode, French Mode, and Swedish Mode—appear on page 16).

In body text, stylistic sets aren't meant to make a dramatic difference. (In fact, you might initially find it difficult to spot the differences between these four samples.) Instead, they let you make subtle changes to the texture and mood of the text, which add up over multiple pages.

In headlines and display settings, stylistic sets can have a pronounced effect.

Throughout this type specimen, I use different stylistic sets for both text and display.

ON THE SUBJECT OF ME

I'm a writer, typographer, and lawyer in Los Angeles.

I wrote the website and book Typography for Lawyers (typographyforlawyers.com), for which I received the Legal Writing Institute's 2012 Golden Pen Award. In 2013, I created the web-based book Butterick's Practical Typography (practicaltypography.com).

My other fonts include Herald Gothic, Wessex, Hermes, Alix, and Equity (equityfont.com).

After getting my degree in visual & environmental studies from Harvard University, I started my career as a type designer and engineer, working for the Font Bureau and Matthew Carter.

At the beginning of the Internet era, I moved to San Francisco and founded Atomic Vision, a website design and engineering studio, which later became part of Red Hat, the open-source software company.

Later, I went to UCLA law school and became a member of the California bar in 2007.

I live in Hollywood with my wife Jessica and our boxer, Roxy.

For their help with Concourse, I thank Josh Korwin, Indra Kupferschmid, André Mora, and Erik van Blokland.

Dedicated to my first typography teacher, Gino Lee (typo.la/gino)
